4. The recurrence of forward stress in compounds with final obstruents, for example: fire'wood, proof'read, ward'robe, work'shop, bed'room, (RP: 'firewood 'proofread, 'wardrobe, 'workshop, 'bedroom)

Jowitt (1991: 88) asserts that “at word-level, the difference between the suprasegmental phonology of PNE (Popular Nigerian English) and that of SBE is most salient in the area of primary stress placement.” PNE exhibits a tone-influenced stress placement on English word. Jowitt gives the following examples of the stress patterns in PNE:

1. Dissyllabic words or compounds: a'cute, broad'cast, cha'llenge, fire'wood, plan'tain, tea'spoon
2. Single words of more than two syllables
 - a. Verbs (including regularly inflected parts), and nouns and adjectives derived from them by a suffixed -or, -er, -ive:
 - i. Verbs ending in -ate: congratu'late, investi'gate,
 - ii. Verbs ending in -ize or -ise: adver'tise, civi'lise
 - iii. Verbs ending in -y: modi'fy, occu'pies
 - iv. Verbs ending in -ish: distin'guish, estab'lished
3. Nouns ending in -ism: cap'i'talism, natio'nalism, ne'potism
4. Hyphenated and open compounds of more than two syllables: sitting'-room, eye'hospital, grammar'school (RP: 'sitting-room, 'eye hospital, 'grammar school).

Akindele (2008) focused on stress in Edo English (EE). EE is a sub-variety of NE. She assessed one hundred Edo speakers of English on disyllabic, trisyllabic, polysyllabic and compound words. The research confirmed that word stress pattern in EE differs from SBE word stress pattern because out of 3500 test items, the participants were able to appropriately stress 709 (19.2%).

Sunday (2008) worked on compound stress in NE, focusing on Educated Yoruba English (EYE). The participants of his study were 50 postgraduate students and a Briton, who served as the control participant. A prepared material was given to the participants to read; this was complemented with casual conversations among Yoruba speakers of NE. Metrical Phonology served as the theoretical framework. The study revealed that, for two-base compound nouns, adverbs and adjectives in EYE, the common pattern was for primary stress to fall on the first element, which is quite similar to the native speaker's pattern. Compound verbs behaved quite differently from compound nouns, in that, while in the latter, the Compound Prominence Rule (CPR) guided stress placement; either the CPR or the Phrasal Prominence Rule (PPR) guided stress placement in the former. He concluded that EYE has a
